FEDERAL AND STATE JUNE 2013

I. GATEWAY CLAIMS OF ACTUAL INNOCENCE NOT TIME BARRED

On May 28, 2013, the United States Supreme Court held that a credible gateway claim alleging that a constitutional violation led to the conviction of an innocent person is not time barred. McQuiggen v. Perkins, 12-126 (5/28/13). The Court described an unexplained delay in bringing the claim as a "factor" bearing on the credibility of the gateway claim as opposed to an impermeable barrier to bringing a gateway claim. This case is a significant development for an individual who can make a convincing case that a constitutional violation led to the conviction of a person who is actually innocent of the crime but who would be time barred or procedurally barred. This also applies to an individual who has been denied relief based on the AEDPA time bar. If you have a credible gateway claim of actual innocence, you should contact me.

II. JUSTICE SAFETY VALVE ACT OF 2013

On April 25, 2013, U.S. Representatives introduced House Bill 1695 called the Justice Safety Valve Act of 2013 (the "legislation"). House Bill 1695 is identical to Senate Bill 619. The legislation amends the provisions of 18 U.S.C. 3553 by adding a section (g) authorizing the judge to impose a sentence below the statutory minimum to avoid an "unjust sentence." The legislation is significant because it expands the safety valve to include all federal crimes involving imposition of a mandatory minimum penalty. There appears to be tacit recognition that judges should be given the latitude to impose a sentence tailored to the nature and characteristics of the offender. There is no clear-cut sign that the legislation is retroactive, but it is an open question at this point.
